Christensen also asked that the regulations be coordinated with those in effect in local cities sharing boundaries with unincorporated Clark County.

Director of Management Services Leslie Dunsworth and Zoning Administrator Greg Borgel hope to bring back an ordinance within 60 days.

Those speaking before the commission asked that temporary signs be allowed for longer than a week, and that sign matters be handled "uniformly."

Denied to post banner at home not allowed in the residential area.

However, neighbor Terri Nee submitted petitions signed by 44 persons opposing the signs.

Nee said deed restrictions for the Paradise Gardens subdivision prohibit signs for public view except for sale or rent.

A county attorney advised the commission that the deed restrictions are independent of the variance request for the signs, and an issue that could be settled in court but not by the commission.

Don Antrobus then told the commission that he believes the group has the constitutional right to post banners. "I have 50 people ready to carry signs and picket."

"I'll give you the chance to picket," responded Commissioner Manny Cortez. His motion to deny the sign variance passed with a 5-0 vote.

Development Co. supported a conservative effort diminishing proliferation and size and garishness" of signs.

Dunsworth said she hopes to achieve a "balance between community aesthetics and business needs."

She will consider increasing the square footage allowed for free-standing signs listing shopping center tenants, so businesses "will not need illegal signs."

Political sign regulations will remain as they are, on the advice of Hauser said current county rules, which allow political signs in any zoning district if they are removed within 30 days after elections and do not exceed certain size limits, allow sufficient political freedom to meet constitutional requirements.

Dunsworth said that after the sign ordinance is revised, brochures explaining the regulations will be distributed to shopping center managers and others.

Additionally, transportation corridors such as Spring Mountain are slated for enforcement action. Town advisory boards will be asked to recommend corridors.

Generally, however, she said "we don't want to take people to court or cite them. We hope education and voluntary compliance will work."

Zoning Administrator Borgel has estimated that 5 to 10 percent of the estimated 40,000 signs in unincorporated Clark County are illegal. County officials have received 360 sign complaints so far this year.

buildings, A-frame signs, tree-standing temporary signs that violate separation requirements, mobile signs and banners.

Currently, if the county's Public Response Office receives a complaint, the area is inspected and the owner notified if a violation has occurred. Violators are given 10 days to correct the problem. If they do not do so, a certified letter is sent and if there is no response in five more days, the matter goes to court. Judges determine the amounts of any fines imposed.

City annexation application withdrawn

By Diane Russell
Review-Journal

Elva Jean Haugen, who earlier this year was stripped of her Clark County child-care license, on Wednesday temporarily gave up plans to reopen her facility in Las Vegas.

Haugen had requested that 2.5 acres at 1841 N. Decatur Blvd. be annexed into the city, but she withdrew that application Wednesday. Haugen said she has learned the annexation would not help her because she would be unable to reopen the child-care facility in time for the start of school.

She said she had decided it would be more to her advantage to stay in the county.

Because Haugen asked to withdraw the application, the City Council took no action on the matter. The annexation petition will automatically die.

The application had been filed in the name of Las Vegas Valley Church Inc. Haugen said she is president of the church.

In addition to bringing the property into the city, Haugen would have had to obtain a city child-care license.

Haugen accused the city of deliberately handling her application slowly so that she would not be able to open in time for the start of school.

City officials said that was not true.

Harold Foster, city director of community planning and development, said the annexation petition was handled in a timely manner.

And Marge Hether, who handles privileged license applications for the city, said she had told Haugen that Haugen could not apply for a child-care license until the land had been annexed into the city.

The County Commission revoked Haugen's license in April after a lengthy hearing in which commissioners heard testimony about alleged lack of cooperation with authorities and violation of regulations.

Charges brought by county social service officials against her included allegations that she failed to report child abuse at the facility and violated regulations about preparation and nutritional value of food.

One incident brought up at the commission meeting involved a 3-year-old girl allegedly being punished by being put in a bathroom for two hours. Haugen admitted a girl had been put in a bathroom by a former employee, but disputed the time. Metropolitan Police Department investigators said they forced Haugen to fire an employee who admitted punishing the child by isolating her in the bathroom.

Haugen denied the allegations and told the commission she believed there was a conspiracy against her by county employees. She said the allegations against her were made by a former employee.

Haugen and her husband, Norris, operated the Valley Christian Academy/Eager Beaver Academy before her county license was revoked.

Denelle Hahn, deputy director of Clark County Social Services, said Wednesday that neither of the Haugens currently is operating a child-care facility in the county.

Haugen said she may eventually seek a city child-care license, but that in the meantime she will concentrate on trying to open a hospice for AIDS patients.

She said plans are to sell the church building in order to obtain money to build the AIDS facility. She said she believes AIDS patients should have a place to go that would isolate them from society. She said she will try to obtain U.S. Bureau of Land Management property in Nevada for the project.
